Demographic and Health Surveys (DHS) are a series of standardized surveys that provide information on a wide range of demographic and health indicators. These surveys are conducted in many countries around the world and are used to monitor population trends and health status. The DHS program is a joint effort of the United States Agency for International Development (USAID) and the International Center for Demographic and Health Surveys (ICDHS). The surveys are conducted by national statistical agencies and are designed to be representative of the population. The data collected from these surveys are used to inform policy and program development. The DHS program has been instrumental in providing data on a wide range of issues, including fertility, mortality, and health status. The surveys are conducted in a standardized manner, which allows for comparison of data across countries and over time. The DHS program is a valuable resource for researchers and policymakers alike.
